Portfolio activity and comment

September lived up to its reputation for being a quiet month for corporate and political news and the main stock markets reflected this. In the US, the S&P500 Index rose a mere 0.4% despite continued good news on the economy. A consumer confidence survey showed the highest level of positive sentiment since the year 2000. Undoubtedly, this is in part due to the lingering positive effects of a tax cut but jobless claims hitting the lowest level of 1969 only added to a picture of good economic health. The Federal Reserve will feel fully justified in having raised interest rates three times in 2018; a faster rate than markets initially thought likely. In the UK, the FTSE100 Index was similarly quiet, gaining only 0.9% in September. Even the normally influencing factor of Sterling fluctuations had no impact since Sterling remained unchanged against the US dollar at around 1.30. Perhaps Sterling should've fared better since the 10 year Gilt yield rose 0.1% to 1.57% but may have been held in check over the stalled and confusing Brexit negotiations. Emerging markets continued to struggle in the face of a stronger US dollar which looks likely to worsen. The fund rose 0.38% in September.
